

I think that the FCC should reconsider backing the ban on satellite radio. They are unpopular enough as it is! The idea that they have ANY right to the information that I PAY TO HAVE SENT TO MYSELF IS LUDICROUS. What's next, are they going to say what information email can contain (sorry, no weather for you; we have friends who own that...)?

I am a Pennsylvania motorcyclist, and as such I need to know what kind of weather is happening in my area before I head to work. Most times I don't have the luxury of waiting until the standard news time (I'm usually late enough as it is...). I just click on my XM radio and check the weather, and so-armed, I head to work. Now, if I didn't have the up-to-date, I'd probably have to take a vehicle that consumes more gas (part of the reason I started cycling in the first place), and with the gasoline price-jump frenzy I can't afford it! Now there is a real issue you should be dealing with, not this childish stuff...

I also believe that the bottom line is: I have the right to hear what anyone I choose to listen to says, and accordingly you have no right to say or legislate otherwise!
